

SIF Students Visit the Bureau of Engraving & Printing, Complements of Goldman Sachs

“WOW! Look at all that money! This is way cool!” These words came from several seventh grade middle school students from Washington Jesuit Academy. It was in June 2011 that they toured the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in Washington D.C. along with 9 investment professionals from Goldman Sachs Community Teamworks.

Millions of dollars were seen streaming across conveyer belts. They started as blank sheets, ended as wallet-ready bills and were surrounded by stacks of 4-foot monetary treasures. The group learned how and why some bills have been redesigned, about security features on bills such as watermarks, and the location of the national symbols. The tour was followed by lunch at the Department of Agriculture.

Afterwards, students joined in unison with a loud and clear: thank you to Goldman for enabling this experience. “You gave us a chance for a great experience!” This field trip, underwritten by Goldman Sachs, is part of their company’s volunteer initiative and showcases the company’s global philanthropic efforts.
